The photo was taken on Nov. 11, 2011, at Hagood Mill Historic Site in Pickens, SC. I was visiting Hagood Mill, which is an extraordinary place. Hagood Mill is an operational water-powered gristmill built in 1845 by James Hagood near Pickens. It was listed in the National Register of Historic Places in 1972. It holds monthly programs featuring craftspeople, many of the Cherokee, and other American Indians.

If you happen to be in the area, give yourself a treat and visit the place if it's open. I took a photo of this Cherokee woman as she was demonstrating her pottery skills. My camera was a Nikon D300. The lens was a Nikkon AF-S DX VR 18-200, f/3.5-5.6. ISO 250, 200mm, f/5.6, 1/60 sec. It was processed in Lightroom.

Keith Sawyer-Trout Lake Sunrise

This picture was taken on a recent trip to the Upper Peninsula. It was a damp and cool morning. We were finishing our morning coffee and getting ready to start the day's exploration. The car was loaded including my Nikon Z5. We walked to the lake, and I snapped a few quick photos with my phone camera. I look at it a little later in the day and some quick edits on my phone revealed that this was a nice photo.

After returning home I used Capture One to post-process into the photo I entered. The adjustments made were dropping highlights and black, boosting the shadows a little, adjusting red and blue intensity/saturation, selectively editing the sky to add a little more punch and cropping to a 16:9 ratio. It is quite remarkable the quality of image you can get from a 2-year-old phone camera, I wish I would have gone back to get my Nikon to have a raw image to work with.
